Waiting to Tell Your Employer About Your Injury

If you were injured in the scope of the workplace, you need to let your employer know right away. If you have a case that is related to your work as a first responder, you need to tell your employer about it as soon as possible so that they can document and get things going on their side of the Worker's Compensation claim with the insurance company.

2 Waiting to See a Doctor

We understand that by going to see the doctor it often means that you need to take a step away from your work, which can be a very difficult decision for you. Many first responders are work-oriented and driven individuals who don't want to want to stop doing something that they feel passionate about. They want to continue to help their community; however, in order for you to be able to help the community, you need to be able to help yourself first and take care of your health.

Ignoring Warning Signs

Along the same lines, a lot of people when they suspect that they are suffering an ailment or an injury, try to ignore the warning signs because they don't want to step away from their job and stop helping their communities. If you ignore your warning signs of injuries or health conditions, you can worsen your condition, which will prolong your recovery time, meaning you'll miss out on more work than you would have if you had taken care of your injuries right away.

Leaving it Up to the Insurance for Fair Results

4

If you take the compensation from the insurance company without questioning it, you oftentimes are missing out on the competition that you deserve. That's how our Florida workers' compensation lawyers for first responders help. We see these types of cases all the time where first responders aren't getting the compensation that they deserve. We know the true value of your case and will fight for you to get that.

Hiring the Wrong Lawyer

You don't want to hire someone dabbling in these types of cases. you want to hire the lawyer who does it day in and day out. Our lawyers are well-versed in these types of cases and we will do everything in our power to get you a fair result. We will utilize all of our resources to ensure that your case has results that are as full and fair as possible.

Giving the Insurance Company a Recorded Statement

Under no circumstance should you ever speak to an insurance company without first talking to a lawyer. These insurance companies are looking for reasons to rid themselves of your claim, which often means getting you to say something that will lessen the value of your claim. Talk to a lawyer before you talk to the insurance company so that you can protect your rights.

Waiting to Talk to an Attorney

You should never delay filing a claim because, in some circumstances, there is a limit to how long you can wait to file your claim. You also don't want to wait because your condition can worsen, which will make it harder for you to recover. We want what's best for you and having speedy treatment as well as a quick response in terms of your workers' compensation claim is the best choice.
